Image copyright Getty Images Why were children allowed to go to school wearing clothes made of straw? There is a picture of that in the Children's Welfare Amendment Act (1930), which I want to share because it is from the Guardian's Picture Archive, an online resource for historical images. It's of two girls, aged nine and 11, in 1930. One is wearing a starched blouse, the other a "small hat". Image copyright PA This gives a sense of what was normal for children in 1930 - it's kind of a curiosity to look at the fashion for children in the 1930s. There is a bit of light-hearted academic interest. The website curator, Tracey Watson, has written this blog about how she discovered that picture and why it was taken. But it is not academic - it is a story about how the lives of children changed, and that's why I want to share it. It was a time when children were still at home when it was time for them to go to school, but that wasn't always the case. Image copyright Getty Images The law came into effect in 1932 - the Children's Act had been introduced in 1908 and it was amended in 1930. Up to that point, for all children over five years of age, it was possible to send them to school in the daytime, either to a school run by the church or some other establishment.
