The suit in the federal court in Houston charges that Canadian and Australian copyright holders conspired with members of the Motion Picture Association of America, the Recording Industry Association of America and the National Music Publishers Association to alter copyright law in their favor. The suit also claims that a Canadian copyright group led the motion to bring about the bill in Canada that allows the recording industry to negotiate deals with Canadian cable and television networks for programming to be transmitted into Canada. "There is no one year where American content is carried in Canada," a U.S. copyright official charged, "though each year is more important than the one before." "The industry has tried several times in Canada over several years to change the law, so now they are doing the same thing elsewhere," the official said. A similar suit is pending against the Australian government and the Australian company Foxtel. "Foxtel is a member of industry organizations, and we are accused by our opposition of being part of a conspiracy involving organized crime." Foxtel said in a statement that it would vigorously oppose the suit. "We note that the aims of the US Copyright Group in bringing this action are the same as its aims in presenting its `legal aid` argument to the Government of New Zealand and in publicly disparaging the Australian copyright system in the Sydney Morning Herald." it has a powerful predecessor, depending on the nature of the talk. The big challenge here is that basic grammar and usage is rather subtle. It's not simply a matter of translating literally; (I wouldn't say English has a strong Germanic influence, for example). You
