Conventionally, in order to gain access to a resource such as a computer, a user may be required to enter a user ID and a password.

However, the fact that the user must enter their user ID and password each time they want to gain access to the resource has become a major factor that limits the security of the resource. In order to improve the security of the resource, various techniques are being proposed. For example, Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication No. 2003-335845 discloses a technique for transmitting information (access ID) for identifying an accessing user from a terminal to a server, authenticating the information (access ID) with a password of the server, and allowing the access to the server. It should be noted that a URL (Uniform Resource Locator) is a character string used to identify a location of a resource on the Internet. In a conventional network system, in order to gain access to a resource, an application must firstly make a request to a web browser, which must then make an initial request to the server. The server then transmits a URL corresponding to the requested resource to the browser
