In this procedure the nervous tissue in the perineal position is directly and intentionally destroyed, which produces local anaesthesia and spasm of the detrusor muscle. Since the micturition function is in the detrusor muscle, there is a risk of detrusor muscle paralysis, thus complicating the postoperative course. This can be avoided if the procedure is performed with sufficient skill. The objective of our study was to determine to what extent the induction of neural damage in the detrusor muscle is a consequence of the surgery performed, or a result of inadequate indication for the surgery or as a result of an inadequate technique of operation. The study was performed in the period from 2003-2005 in the Department of Urology, Military Hospital in Sk 3da54e8ca3
