How to handle "stop line" of applications? Write a program that prompts the user for a username and password. If the username and password are valid, you are granted permission to access files. If the username and password are invalid, you are prompted to re-enter them. This program contains three layers of security: user name and password authentication, file system authentication, and application authentication. The file system is encrypted with the RSA Cryptography Provider. Start Menu: Access Program -run... Access Program -run a program... Access Program -run a program in a new window... [CX] D9A0B201 I think your line is correct. The wrong line is: Get-process | Select-String -pattern "Access Program -run *" ======================= Re: How to handle "stop line" of applications? Hi lunde46, Thank you for using the Microsoft Developer Network Library and for taking the time to submit your program. Your program, "L:\Test\AccessProg4.exe" contains a few minor errors. The first error is: "Get-process | Select-String". You are attempting to use the incorrect syntax. A "Select-String" command requires two arguments. The first argument is the string to search, and the second argument is the pattern to use. You should use: Get-process | Select-String -pattern "Access Program -run *" The second error is: | Select-String -pattern "Access Program -run *" The "Access Program -run" string should have been enclosed in double quotes. The
