Q: Is it a bad idea to use `user.home` in Linux? In Linux/Unix in general, is it bad to use `user.home` or just ~/.home or simply ~/. to access user-specific directories like Music, Downloads, Documents, etc.? A: Just ".home" is sufficient, though you might also want to use ".local" if you're on a multi-user system. The advantage of ".home" is that it's easy to type in: it's the directory created automatically when a user logs in, so I don't have to remember which directory name it is. The drawback is that it's non-standard. The directory could be owned by root or by another user, or it could have been deleted and recreated. ".local" is the same as ".home" in all these respects, but it's slightly more portable because it's not dependent on any specific filename.
