So, I suggest you to download the.Shane Helms used to make announcements on his Facebook page that he was “a monolithic institution deeply embedded in the culture of a major sport.” On June 16, the Television Academy announced that Helms was stepping down from his position as the Academy’s board president and would be replaced by Lorne Michaels, the creator of Saturday Night Live. The announcement was met with mixed reactions from some of the Academy's biggest names. "I'm shocked and shocked that he had to resign," said Amy Poehler. "For four years, Shane has been my right hand man when I needed him. We did some good stuff there." Joe Pesci said, "I'm happy to know that someone else can take over Shane's position." Bruce Willis said, "He's getting out when he should be getting out." Liza Minnelli said, "Who wants to be a president, anyway?" Helms was not the first president to resign, although he was the first Academy president who used Twitter. He used to chronicle his day-to-day activities in 140 characters or less. He commented on events like the Oscars and former president Joel Silver's failed attempt to enter the film industry, and he had a controversial moment when he was caught using the Twitter account of Donald J. Trump in late 2012 and early 2013. Many of Helms's tweets centered around interacting

Then, he joked that he would tag the National Trust to ask for a discount, as he travels the "M4". However, he has since been reminded that his candles are not entitled to the discount, but he has made the process of asking for a discount in the title of his blog post. He writes: "The National Trust have kindly and half-jokingly told me that I'm allowed to take the discount on my candles, provided I ask. Hope that's OK!" PA
