Replication of infectious bursal disease virus in chicken embryo bursas. Preliminary studies were conducted with infectious bursal disease virus (IBDV) strain 19872 to determine whether bursas derived from hen eggs of one strain or chicks of an unrelated strain, would be susceptible to infection. Inocula comprised 10(5) 50% embryo infectious dose (EID50) IBDV. Chickens were inoculated by the intraocular (IO), intramuscular (IM) and intranasal (IN) routes. Inoculated eggs were hatched at 20 days of age, and the birds were evaluated and euthanized at 2 weeks of age. A difference was seen in survival between the two strains of the birds, but the cause was not attributable to the route of inoculation, because, in either case, the egg source did not affect virus dissemination or replication. Overall, only 47% and 62% of the chicks survived the disease when they were inoculated with strain 19872 by the IO and IM routes, respectively. The percentage of inoculated chicks that survived was not significantly different from that of the uninoculated chicks. In contrast, 68% of the chicks inoculated by the IN route survived. This result indicated that the IN route of inoculation was more effective than the IM and IO routes in promoting survival. Most of the virus recovered was shed from the cloaca. A nonsignificant trend for a more rapid development of bursal lesions was seen in the chicks inoculated via the IN route. History management functional tests History management functional tests
