Pictures, and Photo Effects of Nik Software Color Efex Pro 5.4.2. Pulmonary aortic arch vessel replacement using beating heart technique: a report of 10 cases. The surgical therapy for complex arch anomalies is still controversial. The feasibility and benefits of beating heart technique for pulmonary aortic arch (PA) reconstruction are reported. Between March 2002 and August 2005, 10 patients underwent beating heart reconstruction (BHR) of the PA (2 PA as an abnormal origin of the innominate artery and 8 PA as an abnormal origin of the left subclavian artery). The mean age of the patients was 33.9+/-8.8 years (range: 16-49 years). The PA was as an abnormal origin of the innominate artery in 2 patients, the PA was as an abnormal origin of the left subclavian artery in 6 patients, and the PA was as an abnormal origin of the left subclavian artery and an abnormal proximal origin of the PA in 2 patients. All patients were in New York Heart Association (NYHA) class III or IV preoperatively. The indication of BHR was presence of end-stage pulmonary disease (n=7), serious comorbidities (n=4), and high risk of conventional surgery (n=3). The mean total cardiopulmonary bypass time was 116+/-26 minutes, the mean aortic cross-clamp time was 63+/-14 minutes, and the mean post-infarct time was 3.9+/-0.5 days. Two patients with PA as an abnormal origin of the innominate artery and 2 with PA as an abnormal origin of the left subclavian artery had carotid to subclavian artery bypass. Three patients with PA as an abnormal origin of the left subclavian artery also had left carotid to subclavian artery bypass. There was no cardiac mortality. All patients survived and had uneventful postoperative course. BHR is an important technical approach for PA reconstruction with reasonable postoperative recovery and cardiovascular stability.Q: Which graphics cards to buy, given that I only want to play games?
