Wearable Technology Helps Foster Human-to-Human Connection Susan Diekema, president of AirForLife and Human Kinetics, is betting that wearable technology can lead to healthier relationships — ones that are more connected and active. “More and more people are finding out it’s fun, it’s powerful, and it’s a whole other way to connect with people,” she says, “especially as we’re facing the onslaught of new technology that is not all that terrific, people becoming more and more disconnected.” AirForLife, which was founded in 2003, has created a wearable software product called Ionic to help people connect more with people around them. Wrist and ankle-worn Ionic devices collect the body’s movement data, generating feedback on activity and promoting a deeper, more personal sense of connection. “When you wear Ionic, you’re wearing a little Ionic device,” Ms. Diekema says. “You’re sending signals. It’s only when you look into that monitor, when you look into the eyes of another human being, that you see a whole new dynamic. It’s deeply personal.” Four to eight minutes of conversation among friends adds a dynamic of social engagement to an already busy day. Ms. Diekema’s own experience as a “time deprived” parent reveals an all-too-common problem: We don’t spend as much time with our children as we want to. “Doing everything to make sure the kids are OK is very time-consuming,” she says. “You’re so busy, and there are so many things you want to do, that you start telling yourself, ‘Maybe I’ll start doing it when they’re not around.’” Ms. Diekema founded AirForLife with a goal of helping people spend more time in meaningful conversation, even if they are separated by miles. “In the world of Ionic, you’re in the middle of the conversation. When you look into the eyes of the person you’re speaking to, you’re in the room with them.” Movement is a primary way in which people form those relationships. “When we’re

Erasing features, like erasing the background of an image, can make a large difference in the overall look of a photo. The Gradient Palette can be used to find new ways to fill colors and patterns in an image. The History Brush stores the most recent pasted image, allowing you to quickly go back to a previous state in an image. Often Photoshop is used to fix or retouch a photo. The Retouch tool enables you to clean up images by removing blemishes, red eye, or other defects. The Spot Healing Brush is a feature that works like the Clone Stamp; it copies pixels from one area of an image and pastes them into another area of the image. When you are working on a photograph, it is useful to consider the photoshop hierarchy. The most basic objects in a photo are your background, the sky, the subject, and any foreground objects. The easiest places to put a photo is in the center of a document. Moving the photo to an edge of the document will help keep the image from overwhelming the viewer. When using photoshop for photo editing you should consider color. Color can really make or break an image. Look at your photograph and see what parts of it stand out. Using the History brush you can go back to previous states in an image. It is useful to use the History Brush to restore a poor take to a more acceptable state. The retouch tool is useful for fixing images. It will grab pixels from your image and replace them with an interpolated image. The curves tool can be used to manipulate colors. Adjust the color levels and curves so that the colors in your image look correct. The Lens Correction tool is useful for correcting the perspective in an image. Often when we talk about computers we think about hardware. A very popular piece of hardware is the monitor. There are a few things you should know about monitors. The first thing to know is that monitors come in different sizes. The biggest monitors are the 19 inch monitors. This is how most computers are set up. In reality a desktop computer will usually use different size monitors. The second thing to know is that monitors can have a wide or narrow viewing angle. The monitor is most often used in a two-dimensional view. 3-D technology is more easily used on a television. The most important thing to know about a monitor is that the quality of the monitor effects how well a computer displays graphics and images. The quality of the monitor is
