Then is it true that the center of G is contained in H? I proved that the trivial subgroup is contained in the center but not sure how to prove the converse. Any help would be appreciated. A: Suppose N is a normal subgroup and not contained in N. Consider the quotient G/N: it is a group, since N is normal. Let z be the center of G. Now you must prove that the center of G/N is $\{0\}$, the trivial group. Hint: If $nN=N$ in G/N, then $n\in N$, so $nN=NN=G$. What does this tell you? A 69-year-old woman with previous coronary artery bypass grafting for ischemic heart disease was referred for radiofrequency catheter ablation. The first and second electrical cardioversions were performed using direct current shock through the right ventricle because of wide-complex tachycardia. Cardioversion was repeated twice using intravenous cardioversion and intramuscular lidocaine without any success. The use of a CARTO/CARTO 3 was successful in achieving sinus rhythm. However, there was a small tachycardia artifact in all mapping points, and it was not possible to position a catheter tip on the mitral annulus or the ostia of the coronary sinus. The patient was referred to the electrophysiology department where she had a successful catheter ablation of the scar in the left ventricle with radiofrequency current.FYI - If you have responses I need, let me know.
