* Windows: _ * Mac: _ * Linux: _ ## Lightroom If Photoshop is a computer program for creating images, then Lightroom is a digital photo manager. It enables you to do several things when you open an image. You can view, modify, and enhance a photo in a number of different ways. * View: A number of different viewing options (such as inverting colors, changing the color balance, and enhancing color depth) are available for any image. * Organize: A number of editing actions can be used to modify your images and enable you to tag, organize, and perform other tasks. * Develop: Depending on the version you choose, you can add additional actions such as converting from one format to another. * Print: If you have the camera capture space for more than one camera, you can use Lightroom to ensure that all images on a memory card are related. The _preview_ option is also unique to Lightroom. You can view your files onscreen before you delete, modify, or even apply an action. However, Lightroom doesn't have all the capabilities that Photoshop has, so you may want to consider using both programs to make the best of both worlds. ## Auto-Pilot One interesting way to view your images is to use Auto-Pilot. You simply set it to run when you open a folder of JPEG images and it does the rest. It displays all the images in the folder onscreen and then, when you click a thumbnail, it opens that image. When you are done, you simply click the Auto-Pilot icon. (See the right side of Figure 11-10 for a running example.) If you have multiple folders, you can set it to run for each folder. The default settings are fine and useful, but you can customize it to speed up image-opening time and reduce mouse clicks. And, of course, you can always open any image manually. ## No More Memories With both Windows and macOS, you have a simple

Services Green Party to hold meeting in support of 'phasing out the four-speed gearbox' Plans to ban the four-speed gearbox in cars with a view to making them completely 'phased out' by 2025 are to be discussed by the party at its spring conference at the end of April. Britain already has the most stringent requirements for testing and emissions in the EU and needs to make continued efforts to reduce pollution, said the Green Party. The party suggested that the ban should be introduced in phases - the first phase being the 2016 model cars with a view to all new models in 2025 also having the option of just using a single 'continuously variable' transmission. The Green Party also want to ban cars made from a single body shell and ask manufacturers to phase out the use of plastic packaging. The party said that the measures could be supported by introducing a petrol charge which increases the further drivers opt for higher emission vehicles. Green Party leader Natalie Bennett said: "The strong link between the internal combustion engine and greenhouse gases has been well established in recent years. "The worst polluting cars, of course, are at the top of the range. But there are many less polluting models among models currently on the market. "Our automotive industry makes an immense contribution to Britain's economy, and many types of manufacturing operate around the world on exactly the same principles. "Imported cars will soon be subject to tough new emissions tests in the EU and Japan has already introduced new car standards. The Government should support UK manufacturers to continue manufacturing vehicles that are environmentally friendly, and ask them to make proposals for new standards for 2025." The party's conference will take place on April 29 and its aim is to agree a set of policy proposals that will be sent to the Government and main political parties ahead of the 2015 General Election. You may also want to watch: The Green Party believe the Government should make an immediate investment of £10,000 per person in new and better recycling and recovery services, a move they say will lead to a higher return on investment and improved management of resources. The party also wants to promote renewable energy generation, as well as introduce a soft ban on car manufacturers selling engines with known emissions problems. According to the Green Party the ban on the four-speed gearbox is one of a number of proposals designed to reduce their speed. { "name": "@
